30c: Tonga – Musila

Trade goods such as cowrie shells were sewn by the Tonga into rings in the 1950s. The hair was treated using musila and decorated using cowry shells.

Musila: Red Ochre stone is pounded to powder. The powder is mixed with castor seed oil and boiled after which it is left to cool. It is then applied evenly over the hair. If the hair is hard, then it will coil into dread locks. If the hair is soft, it becomes pop-corn. As a way of further ornamentation/beautification, the hair could be decorated using cowrie shells.

75c: Shona-Bumhu

The haircut leaves hair on the crown of head only. Bumhu refers to tuft of hair left on shaven head. The tuft is usually on the crown and becomes more pronounced towards the forehead. The hair is locked and tinted.

85c: Ndebele - Isicholo

Ndebele men and women both loved to adorn their heads, necks, waists, arms and legs with a variety of ornaments. Hair was generally made by interweaving and coating with gum, charcoal and oil.

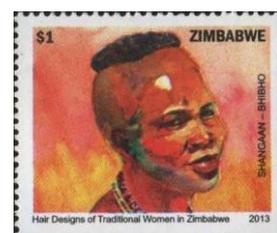

The isicholo style is one of the most popular among the Ndebele women. It is a form of braiding in which the hair runs from the forehead to towards the back or forms a rump on top of the head. From the central or top part of the head, the hair is left as afro-African style that would have been relaxed and stretched upwards standing on its own without support.

$1: Shangaan - Bhibho

The Shangaan people (Vachangana) traditionally and culturally have a strong passion for embroidery, colour, decoration, fashion and imagery. General treatment of hair started with ash being boiled together with animal fat, and when it is hot/warm it is spread evenly and densely over the hair which is then covered with a veil/dhuku overnight. Then the ash is cleaned using warm water. The hair is combed using what are referred to as afro-combs.

The Bhibho which was common among Shangaan was a product of the combination of stretching and relaxing the hair using oil and a heated stone. Most of the hair would be cut very short while leaving the hair at the centre of the head taller. However, the positioning of the Bhibho could vary with individual preferences.
